Making the Right Preparations

From Great by Choice by Jim Collins - Part 2

On the way down the mountain, Breashears crossed paths with guide Rob Hall, tall and confident in a scarlet outfit, commanding his little army of guides and clients, moving up the mountain slowly but with almost military precision. Breashears felt a touch of chagrin, as the day had turned bright and clam, almost pleasant, and Hall looked surprised to see Breashears heading down in such great conditions. Hall looked the Master of Everest as he marched upward, while Breashears quickly passed on by and headed down toward the lower camps. Soon Breashears passed another guide, Scott Fischer, a charismatic force of energy with wild hair; a gigantic, kid-like grin; and passionate love of the mountains. Fischer, like Hall, had questions about Breashears's decision to go down, and Breashears told Fischer about the wind and questionable weather, and that the mountain felt crowded. Fischer flashed a broad, reassuring smile and continued upward, exuding his trademark optimism and joy at being on the mountain in such glorious weather.

The next time Breashears would see Hall and Fischer, 15 days later, en route to his successful IMAX film shot on the summit, both Hall and Fischer would be dead, frozen high on the mountain, victims of the greatest disaster in Everest history, in which eight people had died in 24 hours.

It would be easy to focus on the crucial decisions made on the mountain. We have Breashears's prudent decision to go down on May 8, which likely saved his expedition, and perhaps even his team members' lives. Then there was Rob Hall's decision to ignore his turnaround time as he waited for client Doug Hansen to reach the summit. But focusing on these two moments of decision obscures our view and limits our understanding. The most important decisions were made before the teams even got to the mountain.
