Who Wants to Sponsor a Duck?

The “I Kare for Kids 5K” was cancelled this year due to a scheduling conflict at Santa Fe Dam, but that hasn’t drowned our thirst for a good race. Although the racers and walkers will have a year off, a duck’s life is not so easy. Saturday, November 1st the ducks will still be racing at Santa Fe. The cost for adopting a duck is $5.00 for one or $20.00 for five. All proceeds go to Kare Park, the new Kare facility being built this year near Santa Fe Dam in Irwindale. The duck that wins the race earns $100 for the person who adopted it, second place pockets $50, and third place quacks up with $25. Winners need not be present.

How can anyone ignore this sad little guy? It looks like he needs to be adopted. You can help sponsor a rubber duck in any Kare office.

What are the Standings in My Division?

November will be here before you know it and that means playoff and championship games will soon arrive as well. You can keep up on the latest standings (as well as a lot of other great information) at our website (www.kyl.org).

Kids Who Bounce Back: Part 1

From Thriving Family by Vance Fry

“Good boy!” “Wow, you’re smart!” “This picture should be hanging in a museum!” We all want to praise our kids when they do something well. “Praise and positive feedback are a critical cornerstone for training children,” says parenting expert Dr. Paul Reisser, lead author of the Focus on the Family Complete Guide to Baby and Child Care.

But can praise sometimes backfire and even contribute to our kids becoming less resilient? The answer may depend on how we applaud our kids. In a widely publicized series of experiments with fifth-graders, researchers Carol Dweck and Claudia Mueller found that children behaved quite differently based on the type of praise they received. Children who were praised as being “smart” after solving a puzzle wanted to keep proving how intelligent they were, so they generally selected easier follow-up puzzles. These kids had little interest in improving their performance as long as they thought they measured up well against their peers. They were also more discouraged by failures, performing increasingly poorer after unsuccessful attempts and (sadly) attributing those failures to a lack of intelligence.

But kids who were simply applauded for their effort and hard work chose more challenging follow-up tasks, continuing to demonstrate effort and a desire to learn from the task. What’s more, these kids were less discouraged by failure and wanted to keep trying in follow-up attempts.

In an interview about her research, Dweck told Stanford Magazine, “I asked, ‘What makes a really capable child give up in the face of failure, where other children may be motivated by the failure?’” The answer, Dweck found, may be in kids’ perceptions about why they have failed. Children who thought their failures meant they had less ability were more likely to become discouraged. But those who believed that they simply hadn’t tried hard enough, that ability was something that could be developed, would be motivated by their setbacks. (Cont...)
