A Few Little Known Tales of Abraham Lincoln: Part One

February 12 is the birthday of arguably the most respected president in the history of the United States of America. Abraham Lincoln was famous for having the courage to keep the nation together in a time of great turmoil, and also, for freeing the slaves. What follow are a few stories that you may not be so familiar with. (From Secret Lives of the U.S. Presidents by Cormac O'Brien)

The appointing of applicants to positions in a new administration is something that has plagued presidents since Washington. During Lincoln's administration, when the White House was essentially open to the public, office-seekers would besiege the president with their appeals daily. It could be time-consuming and contentious. Lincoln managed the hordes with his usual aplomb and became famous for finding imaginative ways to dismiss persistent applicants.

"My grandfather fought at Lexington, my father fought at New Orleans, and my husband was killed at Monterey," claimed one woman, intent on getting the president to appoint her son a colonel. Lincoln promptly replied that her family had clearly done "enough already" and that it was time to "give somebody else a chance." When a group of men beseeched Lincoln to make their applicant commissioner to Hawaii (then called the Sandwich Islands), they made mention of the man's delicate health, for which such an appointment would be ideal. "Gentlemen," replied Lincoln, "I am sorry to say that there are eight other applicants for the place, and they are all sicker than your man."

When asked by a journalist how large the Confederate army was reported to be, Lincoln replied with the staggering figure, "1,200,000 men." Seeing the astonished look on his questioner's face, he went on to explain that every time one of his generals got whipped, he claimed to have been outnumbered at least three or four to one. "And we have 400,000 men."
