A Few Little Known Tales of Abraham Lincoln: Part Two

(From Secret Lives of the U.S. Presidents by Cormac O'Brien) He had charm, insight, a way with words, and, eventually, greatness. But Abraham Lincoln didn't have looks. "Barnum should buy and exhibit him as a zoological curiosity," said one New York newspaper. True to form, though, Lincoln was the first to admit his shortcoming. During the famous debates of 1858, Stephen Douglas accused him of being two-faced. "I leave it to my audience," replied Lincoln. "If I had another face, do you think I would wear this one?"

Lincoln's wrestling skill was legendary. As a shopkeeper on the frontier, he won the undying support of a local gang of ruffians by accepting the challenge of their leader to a wrestling match. The details concerning which won remain sketchy to this day and have long since become legend. One thing is for sure; afterward, the gang showed up at every one of Lincoln's debates to show their rather persuasive support.

One time Abe saw a supporter being attacked at an Illinois political rally. He waded through the crowd, lifted the attacker by the head and seat, and threw him some twelve feet out of the building. Nowadays we consider someone amazing for simply rebuffing a heckler in the crowd.

Lincoln found himself cornered at a party by Robert Dale Owen, a devotee of utopian socialism. After patiently hearing Owen read from a lengthy manuscript on the subject, Lincoln was asked his opinion. "Well, for those who like that sort of thing, I should think that is just about the sort of thing they would like."

While practicing law in Illinois, Lincoln rented a horse from the local stable to take a case out of town. Upon his return several days later, he asked the owner if he kept this particular horse for funerals. "Certainly not," said the owner. "That's good," replied Lincoln, "because the corpse wouldn't get there in time for the resurrection."
