The Book of Man* by William J. Bennett

K2 is the second-highest mountain in the world after Mount Everest. Standing at 28,251 feet tall, K2 is located on the border between China and Pakistan. K2 has the dubious title of "Savage Mountain" because of the number of people who have died trying to climb it. As of July 2010, only 302 people have completed the ascent of K2, compared with more than 2,700 climbers who have conquered Everest. At least 77 people have died attempting to climb K2. This means that for every four people who have reached the summit, one has died trying, making K2 the most dangerous climb on Earth.

There are several factors that make K2 so perilous. First is the lack of oxygen due to the extremely high altitude. There is only one-third as much oxygen available at the summit of K2 as there is at sea level. The second factor is the unpredictable and violent storms that sweep across K2 and can last several days. Finally, all the climbing routes up K2 are steep, precipitous, and exposed, making the climb itself dangerous and the retreat even more dangerous. The Savage Mountain earned its name for a reason.

The first successful ascent was made on July 31, 1954, by the Italian expedition of Achille Compagnoni and Lino Lacedelli. Only one year earlier, Charles Houston led an American expedition up K2 in what became one of the most iconic and tragic climbs in mountain climbing history.

Houston and his team, the 1953 Third American Karakoram Expedition, began their ascent, establishing Camps I through III with relative ease because of good weather. They established Camp VIII at an elevation of about 25,500 feet and began their attempt to conquer the summit. It was here that things went from good to bad to tragic very quickly.

While stationed at Camp VIII, horrible storms trapped all eight members of the team for seven days. With hurricane force winds, blizzard-like snow, and rapidly depleting supplies of food and drink, their dreams of the summit hung by a thread. (to be continued...)
