The Thought Card: Part One

By Hanoch McCarty

I must admit that I was still an angry adolescent in my first years of college. My anger was diffuse – the world didn't please me in almost any way. My anger was focused – my parents didn't please me at all. I chafed under my father's direction and correction.

With limited finances, I chose to go to a local college and commute to classes every day. One day I had a serious fight with my father. I felt he was trying to control me, and I wanted to break free. He saw me as rebellious and tried to reassert his authority. We both exploded and I stormed out of the house and missed my bus to school. I knew that catching the next bus meant I would be late to my education class. That made me even more furious.

I fumed all the way to school. My mind was racing with angry thoughts about my father. Like many adolescents, I was stuck in my egocentricity – certain that no one in the world had ever had such a terrible father nor had anyone had to contend with such unfairness.

As I ran across the sprawling campus toward the building where my class met, I suddenly realized that I didn't have the assignment that was due: a thought card. This class was taught by Dr. Sidney B. Simon, one of the most unusual teachers at the school. His policies and procedures were unique, his grading policy revolutionary, his teaching methods unsettling.

During our first class, Professor Simon explained, "Every Tuesday, you must bring in a 4" x 6" index card with your name and the date on the top line. As for what's on the rest of the card, that's up to you. You can write a thought, a question, or just plain anything that's on your mind. It's your way of communicating with me directly. These cards will be completely confidential. I will return them to you every Wednesday. You'll find that I will write comments on your cards. If you ask a question, I'll do my best to answer it. If you have a concern, I will respond as best I can. But, remember, this card is your ticket of admission to class on Tuesdays." (Part 2 next week)
