“Pistol” Pete Maravich: Part Two

From The Book of Man by William J. Bennett

In 1967, Maravich joined the varsity team and took the world of college basketball by storm. For the next here years, he averaged an astronomical 44.2 points a game and led the NCAA in scoring each year. Don't forget that Maravich played when there was no three-point line. Basketball experts estimate that he could have averaged 55 points a game with the modern college rules.

After leaving LSU in 1970, Maravich was drafted by the Atlanta Hawks and signed a $1.9 million contract, one of the highest salaries at that time. Maravich's high salary and flashy style made his transition to the NBA tough. While the crowd loved him, his teammates and coach were irritated. Maravich became one of the top five scorers in the league and an all-star selection, but he could never make it off losing teams. In 1980, Maravich retired from basketball after severe knee injuries kept sidelining him.

Stripped of basketball, Maravich was suddenly lost in the world. He said, “My life had no meaning at all. It was as if my whole life had been about my basketball career.” Turning to alcohol and empty soul-searching, the next few years were a low point in Pistol Pete's life. Then, in 1982, Pete found peace in Christianity.

Soon after, he became a lay pastor and traveled the country to teach basketball and relate his story. During a speech he delivered in 1982, Pete said, “There is nothing wrong with dedication and goals, but if you focus on yourself, all the lights fade away and you become a fleeting moment in life. I live my life one way for thirty-five years, for me. And then the focus came in on who I really was.”

On January 5, 1988, while playing a pickup game at a church in Pasadena, Maravich collapsed and died at the age of forty from a sudden heart attack. It turns out that he had a rare congenital defect and was missing his left coronary artery. For his entire life, his severely enlarged right coronary artery had been compensating for the defect.
