The Importance of Honesty: Part 2

From The Man Who Listens to Horses by Monty Roberts

Roberts went home and did as instructed but Williams didn't take the news well. He responded by berating Roberts, screaming "You useless son of a gun, you wouldn't know a good horse if it leapt up between your legs. That's the last horse you'll ever get from me!"

Several days later Roberts' phone rang. A voice on the other end said, "Hello, Mr. Gray here, Joe Gray." He went on, "I was having lunch with Mr. Williams yesterday. He was complaining about you, but from what I heard you must be about the only honest trainer I ever heard of. Well, I know that Panama Buck horse of his wasn't any good, and I just want to take a flyer on you. I have this horse I want to send to you; it's called My Blue Heaven."

From that point on things started to turn around for Roberts. He gained a reputation as not only a great trainer, but an honest one, and soon he had more than enough horses to train. Eventually he would even have the opportunity to train horses for the Queen of England. And it all started with following some wise advice from a mentor to always be honest, even when the price is high.
