The Almost-Midshipman: Part One

from Paul Harvey and "The Rest of the Story"

Such is the romance of the sea, its appeal especially to the young, that small boys still dream of running off to join the Navy. And so did this one boy.

His big brother had been a Navy man, and had many exciting recollections of his service. Occasionally brother's Navy comrades were dinner guests, and what stories they told!

Reliving their adventures through countless sleepless nights, the small boy grew impatiently into his teens. Now of suitable age to enlist in the armed forces, he discussed the matter with his big brother and received only encouragement. Perhaps, with brother's help, the boy might enter officer's training...might go into the Navy as a midshipman aboard a real Navy war vessel!

It was a thrilling prospect. All that remained was to convince the boy's mother. The proposal was greeted with a heavy sigh. Mother had bravely accepted all the challenges in her life: the loss of her husband only five years before, the difficulty of rearing more than a half dozen young ones all by herself. And here was yet another challenge, to give up the teenager she still perceived as her "baby".

Mother, brave once more, gave her consent. The boy might enlist in the Navy if he wished. And he did.

Surely this was the happiest time heretofore of the young fellow's life, a joyous drama full of glitter and grandeur and great expectations.

Time passes and the boy is now standing before his mother in a dashing midshipman's uniform. He is bidding her farewell. His belongings are already aboard ship, and the vessel is ready to sail. Good-bye, he tells his mother. He will miss her. That's when it happened... (continued next week)
