The Letter: Part 1

From "The Rest of the Story" by Paul Harvey

Edwin Thomas had a genuine genius for Shakespearean tragedy. With whom might we compare him today? Olivier? Burton? (or perhaps Hugh Jackman or Christian Bale) During the latter half of the 1800's, in the midst of a legion of theatrical challengers, Edwin Thomas had few rivals. Although he was a wholly competent and versatile actor, he possessed an uncanny genius for tragedy. How ironic that his own life should have been so marked by it and that his fame should have been overshadowed, his spirit broken, and his reputation nearly ruined by an occurrence with which he had nothing to do! He died with a letter in his pocket that might have set the record straight. But that's the rest of the story.

Edwin Thomas made his acting debut at the age of fifteen, when he played Tressel to his father's Richard III. Two years later in New York, Edwin himself took the role of Richard III, but he was not to achieve any real acclaim until after his father's death, in 1852. In the years that followed, he met with world-wide success. In New York he performed Hamlet for one hundred consecutive nights...in London he used the true text of Shakespeare, anticipating by years a similar reform in England.

Edwin had two brothers, John and Junius, who were also actors. Neither was of Edwin's stature, though the three together gave a memorable performance of Julius Caesar at New York's Winter Garden Theater in 1863. The fact that Edwin's brother, John, took the role of Brutus during that performance is particularly significant when you understand that he was on the brink of organizing a conspiracy in real life. Within two years, John would assassinate President Abraham Lincoln. You see, Edwin Thomas' last name was Booth. His less gifted brother, in whom the assassin Brutus was reborn, was John Wilkes Booth. (To be continued...)
