Thanksgiving (A Civics Lesson in Gratitude) from the Washington Post Part Two

There's also a civics lesson in properly understanding the virtue of gratitude. That great moral philosopher, Adam Smith, thought gratitude necessary for a free society. It can inspire people to care for others when there is no threat of coercion and no incentive. It is altruism, the sense of mutual cooperation and individual responsibility wrapped up in one.

For most of our history, it made American civil society work. Smith put it this way: "Beneficence is always free." And from that freedom flows charity, volunteerism and, as Alexis de Tocqueville says, the many "associations" of civil society that once made America a successful nation.

Unfortunately this understanding of gratitude as a civic virtue is not as prevalent as it once was. The once-fierce sense of individual responsibility that prevailed for much of American history has given way today to a sense of collectively enforced compassion. We expect the government to do for us what we once insisted we must do for ourselves.

This switch has come at a price. Government-enforced compassion, whether as "giving back" to society or showing "how much I care," sucks all the virtue out of the acts. As Smith observed, to oblige a person "by force to perform what in gratitude he ought to perform, and what every impartial spectator would approve of him for performing, would, if possible, be still more improper than his neglecting to perform it."

In other words, an act cannot be virtuous if it is coerced. It can be virtuous only if it is voluntary.

So there's not only an ethical lesson in Thanksgiving, but a civic one. A free society depends on the freedom of individuals to be grateful and compassionate. Remember this the next time you offer a blessing for America. That freedom, after all, is what made America a great country to begin with.
